

Fists, Hot Water and Bees Prove to be Good Weapons When Soldiers Get in Pinch

The rifle and the 42-centimeter gun have not entirely ousted more primitive weapons, as reports from the front constantly remind us. The Anglo-Saxon, for instance, always loves to use his fists. One such incident occurred at Compiègne, early in the war. The farther of the Sixth Dragons, hearing the charges sounding, rushed from the forge, leaped to horse and dashed at the Germans, wielding the hammer which he had been working at the anvil with terrible effect upon the foe.

Among the members of the London Scottish who took part in their famous charges at Messines, is Private Greig. "It was in the thick of the charge," he explained, "when hand-to-hand fighting was at its height, that my rifle and bayonet were knocked from my hands. At the same moment I found myself hemmed in by the enemy, three of whom confronted me with bayonets fixed. In a fit of desperation I seized the two outermost bayonets in my hand and forced them away from immediately ducking and striking at the third man with my fists. How I managed it I do not know, but the ruse proved successful and in a few moments I was back amongst our own men, though my hands were so badly cut to allow of my participating further in the fighting at the time."

Use Fists in Charge.
Many instances are on record where Tommy, with only his bare fists to defend himself, has dealt out severe punishment to his armed and fully-equipped enemies. Away back in the Crimea we are told of an exploit which is but typical of many others. An advancing body of Russian infantry bore down upon a gun battery, of which Lieut. Miller had charge, when he was without any support. One last round was fired, and then bidding his men "Draw swords and charge!" he rode out under the hail of bullets straight into the enemy's midst. The

at least, to give the Russians a "hot" reception.
The Russian assault upon Geke Tepe, the Turkish stronghold, took place on a blazing hot day. As their infantry charged down the place seemed as still as the grave; then, all at once, Hades was let loose. A gigantic hand-to-hand struggle developed, in which modern rifles were of no more use than crowbars. The best disciplined troops in the world became part and parcel of a howling, screeching rabble. Women pouring with sticks or stones or threw boiling water over the attackers. Men rolled to the ground locked in a grim death embrace. No one asked for quarter or gave it. It was the Russians who eventually turned tail and fled from the awful scene, leaving their artillery behind. Stones and boiling water fixed Geke Tepe in the Russian memory in a very unforgettable fashion.

Abundant as it may appear, the humble domestic blanket upon this occasion decided the issue of a battle and led to the complete rout of an army. It was a generation ago that the Zakut Indian rose in rebellion against the government of Mexico, and the rebels were at last brought face to face with the Mexican army. When the Indians advanced to the attack they sent in advance a covering line of men carrying a bulwark of wet blankets in vain the Mexicans tried to destroy this barrier with their bullets, not a single blanket was penetrated, and when the Indians were sufficiently near they emerged from their shelter and, dashing at the Mexicans, put them to ignominious flight.

Resort to Bees.
During the battle of Bornis Heights, when an American force, under Gates, defeated the British troops, it is said that, when our batteries ran out of ammunition they collected some bees and threw them at the enemy. The bees' stings caused the enemy to retreat, and the return journey, probably the queerest "bullet" on record, however, were those used against the Danes when they attacked Chester in the early centuries. The invaders were indeed met by novelty in the shape of ammunition, for the Saxons collected all the bees in the town and then threw them upon the foe. "Thunder" was the cry at the desired effect, for they caused so much swelling of the arms and legs that the Danes were glad to get out of the way.
